How aromatherapy helps for cancer?

It has also been postulated that some essential oils or their components could complement conventional cancer treatments which essential oils have a positive effect on the immune system, at a chemical level, over and above their direct effects on tumour cells.

The side effects of some conventional treatments for cancer can be very hard to endure. The cancer patients were mainly undergoing chemotherapy and radiation therapy following surgery and without exception, they found the going very tough. Aromatherapy has become the main complementary used in the UK to support oncology patients.

Cancer is a very serious disease and establishing and implementing safe levels for potentially carcinogenic or photocarcinogenic essential oils is therefore of great importance. In some cases the level of risk is such that the oils should probably not be used at all in aromatherapy. In addition, certain essential oils can irritate or sensitize the skin regardless of light exposure.

Anti-oxidant activity is at the foundation of many of the therapeutic properties attributed to essential oils and their constituents, including a range of 'anti-cancer' effects. Although the treatment of cancer does not form part of aromatherapy practice, several investigations have highlighted this potential of essential oils. There oils might be used in prescriptions with a preventative intention, or when maintenance or enhancement of general wellbeing is the main goal.
